Sessions with Sensei

What's the best way to engage with Japanese in a professional setting?

Sushi masters, they're really passionate. Jounetsu was the word used earlier and I really believe that. So this is a quote from a very famous iron chef here in Japan and he said "I've been making sushi for 38 years, and I'm still learning."

Marvin Go

Sales Head, Bloomberg, NEF

I think there's two culture thing that you can pick up from this:

- First is the drive to continuously improve oneself. The other one that I want to mention here is the fact that there's a Japanese Culture that you have to be humble, to put yourself down and to put others higher.

What's the best way to learn Nihono?

Selah Filardo

People Manager for HR Operations, Accenture

- As one major private foreign language institute in Japan words it "Learning a foreign language requires constant daily effort." Why I love this advertisement is because learning a foreign language is not just entertainment, it's not something easy. It shows the combination of this daily constant effort—the formal training, mentoring, practice and application. That makes us develop, that helps us improve, that helps us be more competitive.

What are the advantages of being a multilingual?

- A lot of my friends for example tell me that I am a much nicer person when I speak in Japanese, when I deal with people in Japanese. And I think it's because of the language itself—it helps me calm myself more. The fact that I know another language gives me access to a whole different world.

As mentioned by Marvin earlier. He quoted Charlemagne on "to have another language is to possess a second soul" it's not just another way to speak or how we can put our words in different language. It's all about absorbing a culture, absorbing a life. It's about the words being alive in us in creating that words within ourselves and that leads us to possessing a second soul.
